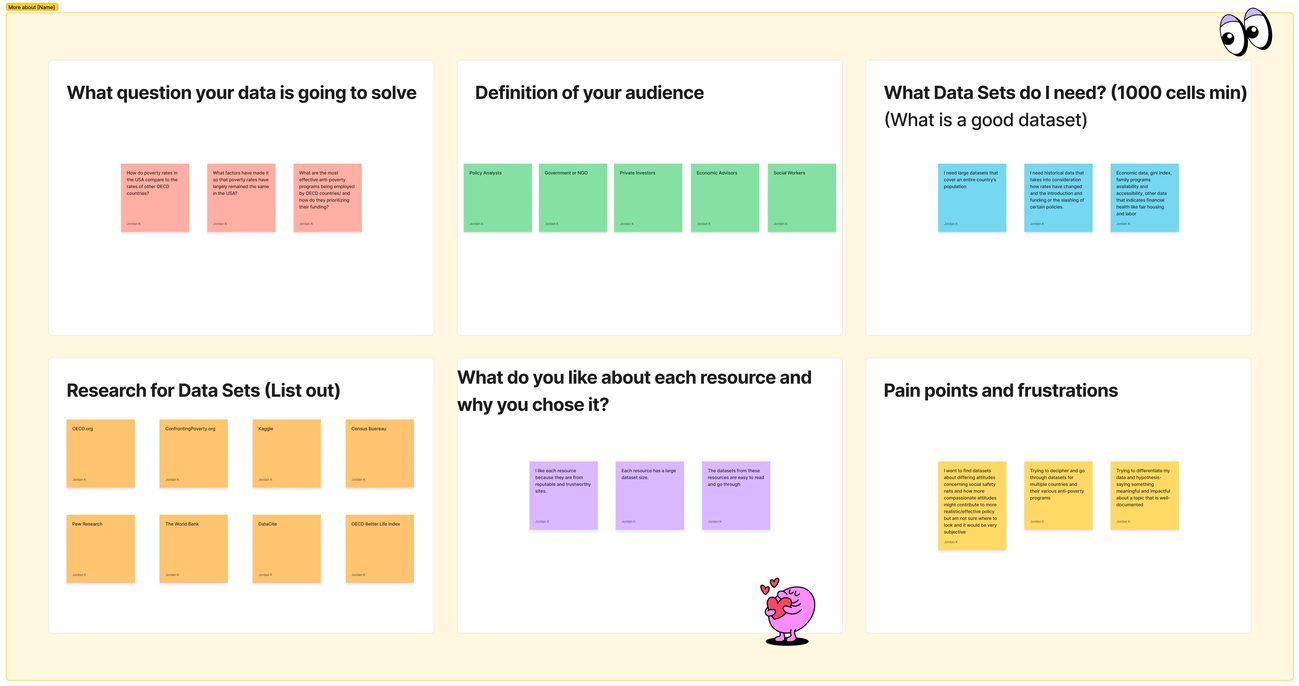
I want to build a data analysis that answers the following question about poverty rates within the United States and how those rates compare to other OECD countries


- If we consider that Americans are in some of the worse shape compared to their OECD counterparts, have the rates become more extreme and prevalent compared to OECD nations? What programs are being mismanaged, are attitudes becoming worse, and how does the USA social safety compare to similar nations?
- How are OECD countries investing in their citizens and which of their anti-poverty programs are most effective?